...her. That he expects to be richly compensated isn't a surprise. Egrams job was made difficult by the packets which were wild, and the Traders who were obstinate. The packets landed on her desk, still with their own agenda, and immediately begin to rise. They would rise until they reached a point where they would hover. Egrams job was to assign a value to each packet. Invariably the Trader standing at her desk connected to the packet had a different idea about its value than Egrams experience told her the packet was worth. So, she spent most of her day listening to all the reasons the different packets were worth more than the values she assigned them. The Trader always argued for the height the packet reached, but Egram knew the value was the rate of acceleration. The... [Contents: Original story illustration (gouache) and handwritten text.]
