Not illustrated. 1903 Excerpt: ...each into a Petrie dish. After two or even one minutes exposure to the air we will place the covers on the dishes and put them away, one into an incubator at a temperature of 100 F. and the other into a cupboard at the ordinary temperature of the air, say about 60 F. Going back to the egg we will make a slide preparation from it, staining with Gentian Violet. This on examination under a--in. 12 oil-immersion lense will be found to be quite free from any micro-organism, thus shewing that at the beginning of the short exposure to air the portions in the Petrie dishes were also free from any contamination. If when twenty-four hours have elapsed we make a film of the egg which has been incubated at 100 F. staining as before with one of the microscopic dyes (Gentian-Violet by preference) in order to throw into prominence any microbes that may be present, we shall find it to be a teeming mass of septic cocci and bacilli, derived from its inoculation during the brief period of a minute with the septic spores contained in the air. The same condition will be found in the specimen at 60 F., but in this case we shall have to wait for three or four days to have gone by, thereby learning that while yelk of egg is always a particularly good medium for the cultivation of the septic bacillus its fostering qualities are considerably influenced by the temperature at which it is kept, and that heat greatly enhances the vigorous growth and development of the bacillus. As a natural corollary to this will follow the deduction that the more vigorous are the bacilli, in consequence of the heat associated with their generation, the more virulent will be their nature and the more able will they be to work harm
