

Welcome to the Doomsphere: Sad Puppies, Hugos, and Politics

After several years of unrest in science fiction fandom, a gang of authors under the banners Sad Puppies and Rabid Puppies came to town to change the Hugo awards and perhaps publishing, and to turn over a few tables. Regular fandom responded, with many of the major names in F&SF literature being drawn into the brawl. What followed was cheating, lies, insults, rape and death threats, challenges to duel, letters to the police, harassment, boycotts, racial slurs, accusations of censorship, and according to one major Pup author, sodomyso much sodomy. For nearly six months, the best authors of our generation stopped writing books and started arguing. Was it the culture wars entering literary science fiction? Was it mainly White, mainly male fans trying to turn back the clock? Was it an attack on freedom of speech? Was it revenge for past slights or a cunning plan to sell a lot of books? Matthew M. Foster, a not-at-all-uninvolved fan, tells the tale of SF fandoms latest feud in these intertwined essays. He supplies the background, including the numerous previous disputes, looks at the personalities involved, spells out what happened and to whom, and spices it with plenty of opinion. He wraps it up with an examination of where the Puppy Mess fits into larger culture and what it all means.
