

Indoor Fun Superbook Book 3. Photography Guide

This is a book of resources about photography. Photography is at #770-#779 at the library. There are many websites about how to learn photography and how to learn computer art or photo-editing. Photography is easy to learn. Capturing moments in time is beauty and truth. A good picture can change peoples lives. Photographs can be easily faked with gimp.org or some other photo-editing software. Even with cameras in cell phones, people still need professionally-made photographs in business and for personal pictures because they want them done right. The hard part is advertising. In most local areas, if you do an internet search for photography service, a few websites will come up. Thats what you have to do if you want to be successful as a photographer. Set up a website and try to load it so that it comes up for local internet searches for the term photographer (local area). Armed with your camera and some good advertising, you can do weddings, models, family portraits, passports, student photos, real estate pictures, aerial photography, local newspaper coverage and almost anything else that requires a picture. You can easily start this work part-time and work into full-time work based on your success and inclination. Not much equipment is necessary to get going. Photographers and camera operators use their cameras and film to portray people, places and events much as a writer uses words. Because the procedures involved in still photography are quite different from those used in news and motion picture photography, workers generally specialize in one or the other. Those who are skillful can capture the personality of individuals or the mood of scenes on film. Photographers specializing in scientific, medical or engineering photography expose worlds normally hidden from our view. Most photographers use a wide variety of cameras to achieve desired results. Unlike snapshot cameras, which have a lens permanently attached to the camera body, the professional cameras are generally constructed to use a variety of lenses designed for close-up, medium-range or distance photography. In addition, professional photographers use a vast array of mechanical equipment from the simple tripod to specially constructed motorized vehicles. Besides cameras and lenses, photographers use a variety of film and colored filters to obtain the desired effect under different lighting conditions. When taking pictures indoors or after dark, they may use electronic flash units, floodlights, reflectors and other special lighting equipment. Some photographers develop and print their own photographs in the darkroom and may enlarge or otherwise alter the basic image. Many photographers send their work to laboratories for processing. In addition to the skilled use of cameras and accessories, photographers must be able to compose their pictures with creativity and style. Still photographers may specialize in a particular type of photography such as portrait, fashion or advertising. Portrait photographers take pictures of individuals or groups of persons and often work in their own studios. For special events, such as a wedding or christening, they take photographs in churches and homes. Portrait photographers in small studios, like other small business owners, frequently handle all aspects of their business. They arrange for advertising and schedule appointments, set and adjust equipment before taking the pictures, develop and retouch negatives, develop proofs, and mount and frame pictures. They also purchase supplies and take care of billing and recordkeeping. Advertising or industrial photographers take pictures of a wide range of subjects including livestock, manufactured articles, buildings and groups of people. They frequently do photography for catalogs. Companies use their work in publications to report to stockholders or to advertise company products or services.
