

ACTUALITY DOCUMENTARY AS A TOOL FOR ADVANCING SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY REPORTAGE

The world is at a point in which science and technology plays a vital role in nearly all facets of human endeavour and the survival of a nation. In spite of this reality, science is underreported in African countries. This study identifies the inadequacies of mainstream news reporting for science communication and advancement and offers the documentary as a panacea to make up for its deficiencies, using pragmatism as an approach to build human relevance into the paradigm of science and to reconcile the empirical demands of science and its application with the nature and principles of the media. While banking on the agenda-setting function of the media to build and advance a national science culture and consciousness, the study also emphasizes the need to align science stories and offerings to the expectations, interests and experiences of the audience in order to reduce or eliminate the possibility of dissonance. A combination of survey, interview and document materials for data gathering from television audience members was employed as methodology for carrying out this research. The result of the research suggests that the attitude of the African public toward science is a reflection of the medias passivity toward it. The study concludes that while the documentary is a viable tool for the advancement of science and technology in Africa, its degree of success depends on the resources available to the media, hence the need for the support and encouragement of the concerned entities in the society. key words: Journalism, Mass Communication, Communication, African, Research Topic, Research Paper, reportage
